

Small steps to make big change

Bikash works in Bankura, one of the most backward districts in West Bengal, India. The Society envisions to create an inclusive platform through synergic initiatives and empowering marginalized communities - persons with disability, especially women with disability, towards gender just and right based society.

Living in poverty is a persistent problem in this part of the region. But there are friends who thought to make a difference amidst adversity. Perhaps, that very name is Sundara. She is 16 years old suffering from Albinism with blindness. She scored 75% marks in secondary examination conducted by West Bengal Board of Secondary Education disowning her disability and poverty situation. She dreams to walk miles ahead...

She was one among the many on 29th May who shall lead the alliance and voice for equal rights and opportunities. Women with disability from different blocks of the district participated in the one day seminar jointly organized by Bikash, AWWD and District Women and Child Development and Social Welfare section. Role of civil society and government in identifying women with disability as key actors in development process was discussed with focus on education and women with disability.

Together we can...
